Will Kay, the Guardian's editor-in-chief, said: "We have called on publishers to commit to a thorough review of their existing policies and practices in relation to the publication of material leaked in breach of national security." The secret lawsuit was filed against the Guardian on behalf of Osama Bin Laden's son Hamza bin Laden, who died in a U.S. military operation in Afghanistan in June. The lawsuit claims that the newspaper knew about bin Laden's capture for several weeks before publishing details, and claimed there was "ample" evidence that the Guardian's editors decided to publish the photographs despite advice from the Government's senior intelligence official. It claimed that the newspaper chose to withhold the pictures from national security advisors, even though they had been shown to the editors, and had been shown to the CIA and the Nsa. The court papers said The Guardian's editors had also rejected advice from the Nsa and the CIA not to publish the pictures. They say that the newspaper's contact with the Nsa and the CIA had been minimal and intermittent. It said: "The Guardian's editors appear to have concluded that the Nsa's failure to weigh in favourably on the publication of the material justified the risk to national security that otherwise would have resulted from their publication." The lawsuit also alleges that the newspaper's contacts with the U.S. administration and the Nsa resulted in "lopsided" information. Bin Laden's death sparked anger among many Muslims around the world who argued it came at the hands of the U.S. military and U.S. intelligence agencies. The lawsuit described the newspaper's coverage of the news of bin Laden's death 3e33713323
