Budweiser (USA) Pepsi (USA) Bud Light (USA) Heineken (Netherlands) As the long running 125oz-17oz ad will attest, beer is a regular part of our social lives. Most of us couldn't imagine not drinking beer. The good news is that beer has been making countless improvements during the process of brewing, and today's beers rival or outperform many of the beers made in the early years of beer. Most beer gets its flavor from two things: the type of grain used in the making of the beer, and the yeast that is added to the beer during fermentation. This is of course just the tip of the iceberg. The main aspect of a beer that we notice is the flavor of the beer. A fine example of the difference in the way humans can taste different is the wine, which is very noticeable for its alcohol content (not of course for the crispness and refreshing taste as is the case with water). One of the ways we taste alcohol, however, is through the receptors on the tongue that are sensitive to this taste. This receptor is located in the back of the tongue, close to the roof of the mouth. The receptors are designed as a vibration detector that is sensitive to variations in the pressure applied to the tongue. Thus, an increase in temperature will increase the pressure applied to the tongue. The other aspect of flavor is the aroma. It is the volatile compounds that we can identify from the beer, and many of these volatile compounds are aromatic. Many of these aromatic compounds are produced by bacteria (yeast) as the fermentation process continues. These aromatic
