You will get. Chicken Invaders 4.How To Install. All System Requirements. Free Download.The San Francisco Chronicle recently explored the city's sudden bonanza of affordable housing, noting that not only has the number of units in the Mission District nearly tripled, but the price is starting to meet the $1,000-a-month mark. This is great news. And in a way, we should be glad to see that the region's affordable housing situation is so promising. It means we still have time to do something about the housing crisis before the worst effects of high rents and high prices come to bear in gentrifying areas like the Mission and Potrero Hill. Nevertheless, I am saddened by the article's underlying conclusion: People will flee the city as long as rising rents aren't stopped. While the Globe's report on its "no take" policy is just one more piece of evidence for the government to consider when responding to the housing crisis, I want to focus on another issue, one that some readers may have noticed and one that tends to receive considerably less attention. That is the local housing bond. Public financing of housing development is the bane of the housing reform movement because it uses the means of the government to push the private market to produce housing that the market is not yet willing to produce. But the bond is also a source of frustration and concern for those of us who advocate for more affordable housing and progressive taxation
